The only entity that the AI will be able to interact with is the ball. The idea is to represent a state of the game (like here) In the example, (1) is a ball, (2) is where the AI is and (3) is where the player is. While I can see that (1) is a game state, I am not sure I understand the remainder. Can I have more than one (1) or maybe even more than three (1, 2, 3), or would it be better to have another state for the AI, like (1, 2, 3) in the example? A: One 'game state' represents one state of the universe that you are game on. If you are playing a capture the flag game, the game state would represent the grounds, people, flags etc. You would have a current game state, and a history of previous game states. You would have start game state (maybe the grounds are empty?) and end game state (maybe all the flags have been captured). The state of the universe when you start the game can depend on how you define start game state, but generally, you start the game with a current game state. Say you start the game on the grounds, one of the things you'd probably want to track is the state of the game. There are lots of ways to represent the state of the
